The Society holds regular conferences where the meteorological community can present their latest work and science. We hold a biennial conference for the whole meteorological community, which usually lasts for four to five days and is held in various places throughout the UK. Since 2003 we have also held a conference for our student community and this is held every year, again in various venues throughout the UK.

The conferences are a mixture of science and social activity and are extremely popular and well-attended. There are several sessions of talks and sometimes workshops and other meetings. There is also an opportunity to network with colleagues and new acquaintances. Social events often include dinners and other tours or quizzes.

During the main Society conference we also invite keynote speakers from around the world and these are scientists who are renowned in their fields.

The 2015 student conference [1] will be held in Birmingham. The next main conference [2] will be held 6 to 8 July 2016 at Manchester University.
